

Student Aid Centers Invites Students, Parents and Graduates to Launch of New Website

New Website launched that does much more than just offer student loan consolidation. StudentAidCenter.org combines all that college students, graduates and parents need to make the college experience much easier to navigate. Through partnerships, StudentAidCenters.org provides loan information, books and supplies, resume tips, job listings and more are now all in one place.

(PRWeb) July 16, 2007 -- With rising tuition costs in both private and state colleges and universities, students and their families rely on funding for education. However, not all collegiate funding -- nor all student aid lenders -- are created equally. Trust is essential when applying for a student loan or student loan consolidation.

Student Aid Centers is not like other websites that are focused on just convincing you to apply for a student loan. The website was created to help parents, college students and graduates find the right loan for them. It was also created to help graduates consolidate their private and federal student loans so they can afford to pay them off.

Student Aid Centers focuses on students' development during academic years and career placement after graduation, continuing to educate them in critical life objectives and requirements typically in areas not offered as course material in school.

This unique student loan website also offers study materials, tutorials, interview tips, resume writing tips, school searches, scholarship searches, entrance and exit counseling and more to educate its visitors. Now, parents, students and graduates find all the resources that are available to them under one roof, making the professional guidance and tools offered by Student Aid Centers and their representatives exceptional in its marketplace.

One compelling reason borrowers are turning to programs offered by Student Aid Centers are the cash back and rebate incentives, along with rate and principal reduction programs not offered by direct loans provided by federal agencies and many traditional sources of funding.

The ease of applying for loans along with approvals within just minutes, no out-of-pocket cost or prepayment penalties, and repayment terms up to a flexible 30 years and high borrowing limits, keeps borrowers coming back to consolidate their student loans.

In addition to that, Student Aid Centers helps graduate students find funding and loan consolidation options tailored specifically to their courses of study -- from business to law to medical students and graduates. Students -- both undergraduate and graduate -- as well as their parents can discover the information that they need to determine whether or not consolidating student loans would benefit them.

Student loan consolidation enables borrowers to control their student debt. With student loan consolidation, all previously borrowed student loans will be combined. A single payment, therefore, will be all that is required each month, and flexible payment plans are available -- payment plans that enable graduated students to repay their students loans and be able to meet other financial obligations.

Student Aid Centers addresses questions and concerns relating to student aid and student loan consolidation.
